In no small way, St. Louis was forged on the anvil of Manifest Destiny; its earliest library – the Mercantile – took advantage of this circumstance so much so that by the 1870's its Head Librarian could proudly remark that "the history of our country's early and aboriginal history claims our special attention." The leaders of the Mercantile Library clearly understood the historical moment which they seized. They documented this epoch on their new library's shelves. Because of that, almost from its inception, St. Louis possessed a national library which collected the heritage of the new nation. Its greatest achievement has been that from that early impulse the Library has continued to create one of the most respected and comprehensively developed public collections of Western Americana.

The Mercantile Library in recent years has promoted institutional cooperation by providing opportunities for the study of the history and culture of the American West and Westward Expansion which complement the wealth of research materials available in numerous other excellent collections and repositories in the St. Louis region.

The Scope of the Collections

Today, the Mercantile Library's holdings on the history of the American West and the centuries of reconnaissance, which relate to the development and the social and cultural history of half of the North American continent, number over 70,000 printed items. These are distributed in numerous primary and secondary special collections housed in three major divisions of the Library, which include general, rail, and river concentrations. Formats include rare books and scarce pamphlets, early newspapers and virtually unobtainable runs of contemporary periodicals, maps, manuscripts, and archival documents, original art, engravings and drawings, photographs, oral history tapes, motion pictures and microfilm.

Collection Highlights

The Mercantile Library's Western Americana collections hold valuable items on the geography and description of the West, state-by-state. Added to this are early and contemporary works on law, economics, art, literary studies, religious issues, as well as the history of travel and exploration of the region. Numerous primary government documents are also included.

- Selected manuscript sources include the Robert Campbell Papers on the Rocky Mountain fur trade, diaries related to the Mexican War, travelers' accounts, and annotated, authors' presentation copies of early writings on the American West. Other manuscript collections include those by artists George Catlin and Oscar Bieringhaus, as well as important single items by Auguste Chouteau, Daniel Bissell and others.

- Agricultural collections which include distinguished materials related to the range cattle industry, early Western agricultural periodicals, and other primary, printed sources.

- Photographic collections by Alexander Gardner, Thomas Houseworth and others.

- St. Louis Imprints, including almost 10,000 items, document St. Louis's role as a strategic center for the development of the West.

- Squier Collection, including books from the library of noted nineteenth century ethnologist and Americanist, Ephraim George Squier, with annotated texts of numerous sources on native Americans.

- Various special collections such as those of Indian captivities, a collection strength and one of the best developed in the United States, western city directories, and almanacs, including an excellent run of the famous Crockett Almanacs.

- Original art including one of the oldest series of Plains ledger drawings – the Arapaho Little Shield series – oils and watercolors by Theodore Kaufman, Charles Deas, Oscar Bieringhaus, Charles Russell, George Caleb Bingham, and others; also original engravings by Audubon, Catlin, Bodmer, Baumann and many others. The Mercantile Library's institutional archives is a valuable resource for studying Western art and artists, a focus nurtured for generations at the institution.
