Curtains: Theater Operations Suspended

by Paul Thompson

Regional theater suffered a major setback last week when Trustee Richard Brin, who had been a vocal supporter of the arts on the board, announced his resignation from the board. The move came as a shock to many in the theater community, who had come to expect the arts to be a priority for the university.

Theater operations have been suspended until further notice, with a possible reopening date in the fall. The decision follows a series of budget cuts and the lack of a new lease for the theater.

A spokesman for the university said that the decision was made after careful consideration of the financial situation and the future prospects for the arts at the university.

Theater patrons have expressed their disappointment and frustration with the decision, with some calling for a boycott of university events until the theater reopens.

Theater operations were suspended last year due to budget cuts, but the theater reopened after a successful fundraising campaign. The suspension this year comes at a time when the arts at the university are facing even more challenges.

Theater operations are supported by a combination of ticket sales, donations, and government grants. The university has been facing budget cuts and a decrease in government funding, which has put the theater at risk.

The university has announced that it will continue to support the arts, but it is unclear how this will be done in the absence of a stable financial situation.

Theater patrons are encouraged to continue to support the arts, either by attending events or by making donations to the theater or the university.

The Vietnamese War was a conflict that shaped the nation’s role in the world. It began in 1955 and lasted until 1975, with the Vietnam War being the most significant of the 20th century.

The war was fought between the Republic of Vietnam and the People’s Republic of Vietnam, with the United States and other countries providing military and economic support to the South Vietnamese government.

The war ended with the defeat of the South Vietnamese government and the establishment of a communist-led government in Vietnam.

The war had a significant impact on the United States, with the country suffering from a political and social crisis.

The war’s legacy lives on today, with the United States continuing to experience the effects of the war on its culture, politics, and society.

When people say that the Vietnamese economic future rested on their developing good relations with other leftist Asian countries, "The Vietnamese have a point," Glassman said. "Don't try to centralize any regional alliances," he said. According to Glassman, there is massive unemployment in both the north and the south, but there is a fairly wide range of goods available throughout the country. "There has been an entrepreneurial explosion there in the last few years," he said. "People were selling something on the street everywhere you went. How this economy is being reorganized, social policy is to have second place to economic policy. The state is left to be a communist party keeping night's law' profits," he said. "The only solution I just met foreigners," Glassman said. The economic infrastructure is not working.

Library Celebrates African American History Month

By Pauliette E. Amaro

February 13, 1989

It’s known as “Black History Month,” but for those at the Western Historical Manuscript Collection (WHMC) in cooperation with the University Archives, the term is too narrow. “African American History Month” is much more fitting for what is being observed this month.

In previous years, WHMC has tried to integrate the African American experience into the history it collects. This year, in cooperation with the University Archives, WHMC has planned a series of events to honor African American history.

“This is a joint celebration of the two organizations,” said John Corbett, the University Archives’ North Carolina Collection Librarian. “It’s an opportunity to share the story of African Americans, their culture, their achievements, and their contributions to society.”

The WHMC, which is part of the University Libraries, houses a vast collection of African American history materials. The collection includes manuscripts, photographs, and other materials that document the history of African Americans.

Corbett said that the collection is not just for scholars, but for anyone interested in African American history.

“People can come in and see what we have, and learn about the history of African Americans,” he said. “And they can learn how to use these resources to learn about their own families.”

The University Archives, which houses the University’s official records, also has a strong collection of African American history materials.

“In addition to the collection of African American history materials, we also have materials on the broader topic of race relations and social justice,” said Tom Thompson, the University Archives’ assistant director.

The University Archives and WHMC are partnering to offer a series of events throughout the month of February to celebrate African American History Month.

On February 15, the University Archives will host a panel discussion on African American history. The panelists will include members of the local community who have knowledge of African American history.

On February 16, the University Archives will host a workshop on how to conduct research in African American history.

On February 17, the University Archives will host a film screening of a documentary on African American history.

The University Archives and WHMC are also partnering with the Western Historical Manuscript Collection to create a special exhibit on African American history.

“This is an opportunity to bring together the resources of the University Archives and WHMC to celebrate African American history,” said Thompson.

The exhibit will feature materials from both organizations, including photographs, manuscripts, and other materials that document the history of African Americans.

The exhibit will be on display in the University Archives lobby from February 15 to March 15.

“We are excited to be able to celebrate African American history in this way,” said Thompson.

4:08 remaining, Shotblocker blocked a three point shot in an attempt to give the Riverwomen victory. 1:45 left, the Riverwomen were able to get a shot off and take the lead back over SEMO. 1:26

The Rivermen only managed to grab 57 rebounds to the Lady Bearcats 60. Southwest Baptist's Steve Shields ended the game with 24 points. Southwest Baptist's Chris Pilz had a huge game against SEMO, finishing with 14 points. After the game, Larson thought the Riverwomen were not as successful at stopping the transition game.

The last minute was huge for the Riverwomen. They committed only two fouls before and during the Feb. 15 overtime. This would be the first time in two years that the Riverwomen were not successful. No eyewitnesses saw the two cars involved at the scene. The best time to the scene was one to two minutes, he did not know what happened, but knew someone broke a car window.

It was a year of two events: the SW Kotlin Conference and the Southwest Baptist Riverwomen. One of those conference fouls, the best time to the scene was one to two minutes, he did not know what happened, but knew someone broke a car window.

Larson did say that one negative aspect about the year is... . Scott Brandt, who was also a player and coach for the Riverwomen, said one of the cars windows was to take his stereo, but were unsuccessful. No eyewitnesses saw the two cars involved at the scene. The best time to the scene was one to two minutes, he did not know what happened, but knew someone broke a car window.

The Rivermen needed everything they had to do away with SBU. The turnover was that they committed 13 fouls and we didn't start off too well.
MIIA Expansion Causes North, South Division

by Tom Kovach

Due to growth in the Missouri Intercollegiate Athletic Association, two new divisions will be created to alter the overcrowding. The sports affected are basketball, football, and softball.

Ron Jones, commissioner of MIA, said the switch to both one and two divisions would be a teamwork effort by Minnesota-St. Cloud and Minnesota State-Mankato.

Teams competing in the Northern Division will be: Lincoln University, Missouri Western State, Northeast Missouri State, Northwest Missouri State, Northern State, University of Kansas, and Central Missouri State.

Teams competing in the Southern Division will be: St. Louis Community College, MNU, MFA, and Central Missouri State.

The switch will be for the 1989-90 season.

Student Life Award

For the third consecutive year, the Division Committee of Student Affairs will present its Student Life Award to a UM-St. Louis administrative, faculty or staff member who has enhanced the quality of student life on campus.

All members of the UM-St. Louis community are invited to submit for consideration the name of an administrative, faculty or staff member whose attitude, actions and efforts have had a positive impact on the quality of student life on campus. Nominations for this award should possess that unique blend of qualities and characteristics which contribute pride in the University, excitement about his/her chosen vocation, involvement above and beyond normal expectations, enthusiasm from others, and a level of enthusiasm that is contagious. Nomination forms request specific details that will substantiate or strengthen his/her nomination.

Final recipients of this award are:

- Maxineokes: School of Business 1981
- David Sato: School of Business 1982
- Carlene Johnson: University Center 163
- Paul Townes: School of Education 1983

World Class Fare

College of Arts and Sciences Dean Florence Jones announced this week that the university's theater program was being suspended indefinitely to help balance the college's budget. The move was long anticipated, but not because people were worried about finding the $25,000 needed to keep the program alive. Rather, those who anticipated cuts did so out of a tacit understanding that this university simply does not support the arts—liberal and performing. Despite pious rhetoric from Chancellor Marguerite Barnett and other university officials who say the arts have their support, this week's decision by Dean Jones confirms the reality of the situation.

The reality is this: If you ain't in math, science (including political science) or computers, when the axe falls, it falls on you. Sure, money's tight. But it's how the resources are allocated that determines what university's priorities truly are.

Locals in, announcing the cut, said that the theater program just doesn't have adequate facilities. "If you want to have a thriving theater program without adequate facilities," Jones said, "it just won't happen." But the university could be suspended until the university's priorities are aligned with the state's. The reality is this: When they see the administration cutting programs that, even years from now, the program will be in place to utilize, the arts—liberal and performing, are a prospect in itself far from certain.

Jones's logic is akin to building a road through the wilderness and then trying to find people to drive on it. John Gorges, president of the University Players, the student group which puts on theatrical performances in cooperation with the communication department, said that the cuts to the theater program demonstrate what this university is trying to do to the arts.

"My worry is that this campus is slowly becoming nothing more than a university dedicated to business degrees and science and degrees," Gorges told Current editors.

Gorges's point is this: If the theater program cuts are any indication, then the arts—liberal and performing—are a grave disservice to culture, something which every university persuades the state to fund a new performing arts center, has a thriving theater program without adequate facilities," Gorges told Current editors. "If you want to have a thriving theater program without adequate facilities," Jones said, "it just won't happen." But the university could be suspended until the university's priorities are aligned with the state's. The reality is this: When they see the administration cutting programs that, even years from now, the program will be in place to utilize, the arts—liberal and performing, are a prospect in itself far from certain.

"I want it to go on record that this dean and this chancellor have destroyed the performing arts on this campus," said Gorges.

"We hope that's not the case. But from all appearances, that's exactly what's happening. Concern for science and math dominates the university, not the arts. If the arts—liberal and performing—are a prospect in itself far from certain, then the arts—liberal and performing—are a disservice to culture, something which every university persuades the state to fund a new performing arts center, has a thriving theater program without adequate facilities," Gorges told Current editors. "Building a world-class university" has been the catchphrase for Chancellor Barnett's administration. We wonder if she wants to build that university in the Third World.

Life, it seems, is a constant rediscovery of self. When one door closes, another door opens. We are still finding ourselves in new ways, surrounded by new people, new situations. The body—commonly referred to as the ego—remains constant except the struggle for identity, who am I?

State Of The Arts: Bleak But Not Hopeless

What Kind Of Job Is The University Doing?

by Shawn M. Foppa

As a land-grant institution, the University of Missouri has three imper- vious missions: education, research, and public service. According to C. Peter Magrath, President of the University of Mis- souri, "the land-grant university is here to provide opportunities for all who can take advantage of them."

The university meets that com- mitment in the fine arts, at least as respects art history. In many ways, however, U.M.-St. Louis lacks the support of the arts compared to the big city flagship campus. In the arts, other pro- grams are expanding, but the arts program appears to be shrinking. Barnett, the University's chancellor, says that the arts program is "in the early stages of development" and "the program is still in its infancy."

The arts program is not without its problems. "Still not big enough," Barnett says. "But it's growing."

The proposed expansion of the arts program is considered by many to be "fulfilling public radio stations and the performing arts."

Yet the station is not without its problems. "Still not big enough," Barnett says. "But it's growing."
