Happy New Year!

As a neighbor and community partner, I hope that you will join UMSL as we prepare for more opportunities and changes to our landscape throughout this new year. We are rolling out the second year of our Transform UMSL initiative, a multi-project effort that is driving our development of the campus for the future. Furthermore, we are excited to see other businesses expanding their operations in our community. This month, we are also pleased to share some new research from UMSL faculty as well as program updates.

To start off 2024, we hope you will join us as we begin the spring semester honoring the legacy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. at our annual holiday observance on January 15 at 11:00 a.m. in our beautiful Touhill Performing Arts Center. Celebrations, partnerships, and progress are again in store for us in 2024. I look forward to sharing them with you!

Gratefully forward,

MacArthur Foundation releases new report from UMSL researchers detailing attitudes about community safety

Professor Lee Slocum was the lead author of the report, which surveyed community members in three states.

New research by investigators at the University of Missouri–St. Louis sheds light on what it means for people to feel safe – and unsafe – in their communities. The 2023 Redefining Community Safety Report [released in December] highlights how people’s feelings are based on their personal safety and security, their perceptions of their community as thriving and socially connected, the fairness and effectiveness of systems they see for preventing and addressing harm in institutions such as the police and courts, and the responsiveness of public safety agencies. But attitudes about safety are also shaped by factors outside traditional measures of crime, including housing-related issues, visible drug use in a community, people’s distrust of police, prevalence of gun violence, people’s sense of belonging and freedom from fear of victimization.

… “The research clearly shows that community safety goes far beyond crime rates,” said Jennifer Ferone, CUNY ISLG’s deputy research director and director of the SJC Research Consortium, in a news release. “To make people feel safer where they live, justice system stakeholders must take a far more holistic approach and listen to community needs, from creating thriving public spaces to increasing access to mental health services. When we center people who are most impacted by crime and the criminal legal system in the conversation around public safety, we can create safer communities for all. This important knowledge development is the type of work that the Consortium was designed to support: meaningful, data-backed reforms that make communities both safer and more equitable.”  Read more.
