Applied Psychology of Child Advocacy Studies, BA

The Bachelor of Arts in Applied Psychology of Child Advocacy Studies prepares students to be trauma-informed professionals who will respond appropriately to experiences of traumatic stress and maltreatment in children and adolescents. This program prepares graduates to move into a variety of child-serving sectors. Students learn through hands-on skill development, mentoring from professionals in the workforce, and immersive learning experiences including simulations in our "mock house". Advanced interdisciplinary coursework focuses on forensic investigations, assessment and intervention in child abuse cases, and interacting with members of multidisciplinary teams during internship.

Career Outlook

With its strong core in Psychological Sciences coupled with its emphasis on skills expected in the workforce, the undergraduate AP-CAST degree provides the background needed for successful entry into a number of child-serving sectors including child welfare, victim advocacy, social services, education, legal advocacy, law enforcement, juvenile justice, healthcare, public policy, and residential care. The AP-CAST degree can provide the foundation for graduate training in a number of fields, including social work, mental health, law, education, criminal justice, public health, and non-profit administration.
