BRIEFSNelson accepts position at UWT

BY TIM THOMPSON
staff writer

Jack Nelson has accepted the position of vice chancellor for Academic Affairs at the University of Washington-Tacoma. His duties will commence with the 2001-2002 academic year.

Nelson held the same position at UMSL for three years before resigning in the summer of 2000. He had continued working here as a professor in the philosophy department.

UWT differs from UMSL in a variety of ways. First of all, it is a new campus, having existed for just over a decade.

Second, it currently serves only juniors and seniors. Third, UWT is relatively small with a modest array of graduate programs.

UMSL and UWT are similar in one way, though. They are both experiencing rapid growth and expansion. In fact, UWT is increasing at an annual rate of nearly 15 percent.

When asked how he felt about leaving, Nelson said, "I enjoyed working at UM-St. Louis, but feel that I accomplished as much as I could accomplish in St. Louis."

Nelson also described his future goals.

"I look forward to working with other administrators and the faculty of UWT to build a vibrant new institution that will serve the needs of both traditional and non-traditional students," Nelson said. "The population of Washington state generally, and the Tacoma area in particular, is growing steadily and there is strong support for higher public education within the state, and within the area surrounding Tacoma."

Nelson said he wanted to emphasize that he wishes UMSL and its students, faculty, and staff the best in the years to come.

Board approves notification policy

BY JOSH RENAUD
senior editor

After spirited discussion, the University of Missouri Board of Curators voted 6-3 to approve a parental notification policy at its meeting March 22.

The idea of parental notification has met with some student opposition on all four UM campuses. The UMSL SGA Assembly recently passed a resolution urging administrators to consider other alternatives.

The policy was developed by a committee of administrators and students, headed by Stephen Lehmkuhle, UM System vice president for Academic Affairs. It allows the UM campuses to notify parents of underage students after their child commits a "severe" initial violation of the student conduct code concerning alcohol and controlled substances, or after subsequent violations.

Students will be given a 48-hour period to notify their parents on their own, if they wish, before the University notifies them with a letter. The policy prevents the University from discussing with parents details of an incident without the student's consent.

Gary Grace, vice chancellor for Student Affairs, said the Board encouraged administrators not to use the policy as a punitive measure, but as a way to encourage good communication.

"They wanted us to encourage these issues before [students] come to college," he said.

To accomplish that, campuses will send materials to parents of students aged 18-21 and encourage them to discuss the consequences of drinking and drug use with their children. Parents will be presented with the conditions of parental notification and given a choice not to participate in the program.

The policy also includes provisions to exempt students who are married or can demonstrate financial independence from their parents. The University can also choose to exempt students if it receives written recommendation from a health care provider that notification wouldn't be in the students' interest.

"The final version is about as good a compromise as the students are going to get, at least those of us who are against it," said Joe Flees, an UMSL student and member of the Associated Students of the University of Missouri. "Some of the [exemptions] were things that we had suggested."

Barnes College battles nursing shortage

BY DALILA WAHEED
special to The Current

Barnes College of Nursing is fighting in a battle against the nationwide nursing staff shortage, which poses a threat to general health care.

The College of Nursing has experienced a 50 percent decline in enrollment since 1994, said Jerry Durham, dean of Barnes College of Nursing.

While nurses are the number one providers of healthcare in the country, said Durham, the need for them is not being met. Last year, in St. Louis alone, there were 1400 nursing openings, according to the Missouri Hospital Association, said Durham.

"[It is] both a curse and a blessing," said Durham.

Students are aware of the shortage, said Peggy Ellis, director of the MSN Program.

"They are thrilled of course, because it means that they can get a job easily, quickly, and most of them have a choice," said Ellis.

"It's good for us," said Lisa Koob, also an accelerated BSN senior. "But, at the same time, I don't know. When we get out there we're going to be overworked and underpaid."

The College of Nursing has implemented programs that will attract more students to the nursing field.

The Accelerated Baccalaureate Degree Program was created particularly for people who want to change careers. It allows anyone with the proper course work and prerequisites to obtain a degree in 15 months.

An on-line degree is offered to working nurses, who obtain an associate degree, or to anyone who has completed the proper course work.

The College of Nursing has been busy recruiting high school students.

"If you come straight out of high school you can finish in a little over three years, with two semesters and summers," said Durham.

"We have lots of things to offer," said Durham. "All we need is students."

This nursing shortage is caused by many variables and is predicted to only worsen if conditions are not changed.

Women want to get out of the business, the workforce is aging, salaries are too low and the increased healthcare need has led to a staff of overworked nurses.

Women have moved into fields

Jennifer Hites, a registered nurse, fills out a patient's chart in the emergency room at Christian Northeast Hospital while Sylvester Turnipseed, an emergency medical technician, prepares for another call. Last year there were 1400 nursing openings in St. Louis, according to the Missouri Hospital Association. The Barnes College of Nursing is working to alleviate this nursing shortage.

that were once for men only, but men have not moved to traditionally women-only fields, said Durham. In the field of nursing, where 94 percent of nurses are women, that prospect is frightening to general healthcare.

"The women's movement has moved women to work outside of the home in fields other than teaching, nursing and library sciences," said Durham.

But, in an era when "women's work" is being ousted, some women still find the field attractive.

"I went into it because I have a passion for medicine and science," said Bethany Metz, an accelerated BSN senior. "I just love it and I like people, and helping people."

"There's so many things you can do with a nursing degree," said Koob. "I mean you can work in a hospital, you can work in an office, you can work in sales, you can go into business...It's just a diverse degree."

With many younger women straying from the field, the work force is aging.

"Forty-four is the average age of nurses," said Durham. "Only 10 percent are under 30."

Health care will soon face nurses who want to slow down, if not retire, so there is more shortage projected, said Durham.

Nursing salaries have been flat for the last five years, said Durham.

"Caring doesn't pay as much as healing or some other jobs," said Durham.

The starting salary for nursing is good, said Ellis. But there is a cap on salary increase.

Violations prompt internal audit at two charter schools

BY RHASHAD PITTMAN
staff writer

A charter school official said that an "internal audit" of two UMSL-sponsored charter schools is being conducted after the recent discovery of enrollment violations at Thurgood Marshall Academy.

Doug Thaman is vice president of operations at Beacon Educational Management, an education firm that oversees the Academy as well as St. Louis Charter School. He said that some students who live in the county are attending the city school, which is a violation of state law. So far, about four students at the Academy have been found ineligible, he said.

"The board of that school would have to make a decision on whether they will let the child finish the school year," he said.

Thaman said the enrollment issue came about because some city residents felt that certain parents of students living in the county were providing "fictitious addresses" to send their kids to the Academy, a charter school located at 4300 Goodfellow Blvd. in the city.

"There were some city parents who were aware of county parents sending their child to charter schools," he said. "A lot of it came about because a parent didn't care for another parent. Regardless of how it came about, it brought out issues that needed to be addressed and resolved."

Under state law, to be eligible to attend charter schools—which are privately run schools supported by state money—students have to live in the city or live in a county school district that participates in a voluntary transfer program, Thaman said.

The voluntary transfer program allows city students to go to schools in the county and vice versa, he said.

Thaman said that he didn't think most of the parents whose kids were ineligible had "malicious intent."

Bill would allow Bel-Nor to search homes that violate health codes

BY NICK BOWMAN
staff writer

For those students and faculty who live in the Village of Bel-Nor, maintaining a dirty home may spell trouble. If village attorney Kevin O'Keefe has his way, a bill approving an administrative search warrant may allow local police and inspectors to enter properties thought to be in violation of public health and safety codes.

"This proposition will help us enforce public health and safety codes, identify the violations and abate the situation," said O'Keefe at the Bel-Nor town hall meeting on March 20.

Currently, residents are protected under the Fourth Amendment against entry onto their properties without a proper warrant, regardless of any violations.

"This would serve as a vehicle to obtain these warrants," O'Keefe said. "Currently we have no way of obtaining a warrant to enforce these codes."

The primary goal for these search warrants is to keep properties within public health and safety guidelines, as well as to protect neighbors from declining property values.

In a previous case in St. Louis, city officials removed a derelict vehicle from a resident's lawn. The man protested, saying that the vehicle was not derelict and the city had no right to ask him to remove it. An administrative hearing was held, and the courts held that the city indeed had no right to remove the derelict vehicle. If the city had an administrative search warrant, the man's car could be removed by the city, given that the city provided proper notification.

This law is questionable because many residents feel that this is an invasion into their private property.

"These warrants will be handled the same way that any criminal search warrant would be," said O'Keefe. "We have to have a probable cause before we can obtain a warrant. This ordinance is only for extreme cases of public safety and health violations."

Sections of UMSL that lay in the village of Bel-Nor, such as the Honors Hall and other buildings, are exempt from this ordinance.

"The University is a higher government than our city, and none of our ordinances pertain to University property," said Walt Nelson, a Bel-Nor trustee.

The city of Bel-Ridge already has these ordinances in place, and there have been no recent reports of warrants being applied to any UMSL students or their properties.

This intersection divides UMSL from homes in the village of Bel-Nor. Officials in Bel-Nor are pushing for a bill to allow inspectors into homes suspected of violating health and safety codes.

'El Capitan'

is a hilarious farcical production

BY SARA PORTER
staff writer

John Phillip Sousa's operetta "El Capitan," which was performed by the UMSL Opera Workshop, has a confusing plot, overwrought characters, silly songs, a climax that arbitrarily ends, and I haven't had a better time watching a play in a long time.

The plot takes place in nineteenth-century, Spanish-occupied Peru and revolves around Don Medigua (Justin Osbourne), a cowardly eccentric viceroy who just replaced the former viceroy, Don Cazarro (Chris Weller). Bent on taking back his title, Cazarro brings rebel forces together, including his daughter Estrella (Robin Mik) and her fiancée, Scaramba (Paul Robinson), while awaiting help from a legendary soldier, "El Capitan." When Medigua receives word that "El Capitan," in reality an ally of his, has been killed, Medigua himself assumes the role of the soldier. Other problems abound as Medigua's cowardly servant Pozzo (Joseph R. Mosier) assumes his role and gets arrested, and Medigua gets involved in a love triangle with the amorous Estrella and his nagging wife Princess Morghanza (Terree Rowbottom). Meanwhile, there is another love story between Medigua's daughter, Isabel (Christina Rios), and a nobleman named Verrada (Keith Boyer).

With so many subplots and songs to the story, the operetta moved along at a fast pace, so fast that the first act seemed over before it began, and the performers helped further the story with their acting and their hilarious facial expressions, such as in a touching song from Isabel to her imprisoned "father," made hilarious by the rebel's crocodile tears at her expense.

Osbourne's Medigua, "El Capitan," was a hilarious center to the piece, always acting as the brave hero to the rebels, but confiding to the audience his true motives in a one-liner. Part of the humor of the character involved his costume, with an Einstein-like fright wig and a Fu Manchu-like mustache. Osbourne looked every bit a smooth con artist and coward as he manipulated the rebels.

Two favorites of the audience were Rowbottom's Morghanza and Mosier's Pozzo. Rowbottom gave a commanding performance as Medigua's domineering wife, especially at the beginning where she does her best Queen of Hearts impression by commanding the rebels to be gone. The biggest scene stealer, though, was Mosier as the thoroughly confused neurotic Pozzo. His best song was one in which he had to act as Medigua while Morghanza and Isabel are singing to him as a wife and daughter. The expressions on his face while acting the devoted lord were charming.

The one thing that doesn't fit is the love story between Isabel and Verrada. Their one duet is beautiful, and Rios and Boyer had two of the best singing voices in the production. However, their love story was given such short shrift

UMSL Gospel Choir a spring musical success

BY KIMBERLY SILVER
special to The Current

Imagine this: Over 50 choral voices, a rap artist, a live band and dancers that made the entire audience jump to their feet for each song.

No, I'm not talking about the Outkast concert. This show was absolutely free and it was right here on our own campus Friday, March 23.

For those of you who were there, you know exactly what I'm talking about. For the rest of you who didn't make it, you missed out on a soulful and spiritually uplifting event. So allow me to fill you in.

UMSL Gospel Choir hosted their very own "Spring Musical 2001" which featured Rutgers University's Liberated Choir all the way from New Brunswick, N.J. Performances were given by UMSL Gospel Choir, Freshman soloist Dianna Dyson, Rutgers Choir, Rutgers Dancers, Marcellous T, Rose Hill Baptist Church Youth Choir and the adorable Minter Boys.

The choirs performed several selections that immediately had the audience dancing and clapping their hands to the music.

Many people sang along to familiar tunes. It was quite an experience. Some might call it a genuine praise party right on UMSL's campus.

At one point, I had walked outside to make a phone call. I could barely hear a dialtone because it was as loud as Cicero's on a Saturday night. Needless to say, I gave up trying to make that call and went back to inside to the musical.

Marcellous T, an upcoming gospel rap artist, performed a controversial piece, a song entitled "Might Not Mean Much," which dealt with the touchy subject of premarital sex. This song raised eyebrows and spirits because sexuality usually is not openly discussed in the church. Marcellous T attacked the issue by reminding us how dangerous and painful promiscuity can be. He used his rap to minister to the audience.

The entire evening was a success. The Master of Ceremonies, Pastor Linda Mitchell of Union Vine Missionary Baptist Church, was full of energy. Throughout the program she repeated the familiar adage, "When praises go up," and the entire audience shouted in unison, "blessings come down!" UMSL students, parents, staff and friends of the UMSL community all came together to enjoy the positively powerful event.

Lena Thomas, President of G-PHI says, "It was a blessing to see God being expressed on UMSL's campus." UMSL Gospel Choir is an organization that accepts all faiths and ethnicities. Shasta Ellis, the president of UMSL Gospel Choir, comments, "We make music our ministry and would like for anyone who is interested to join our choir." If you would like to find more information about how to join the choir, you should call 516-4024.

Gallery 210 exposes hidden time warp

BY EMILY UMBRIGHT
staff writer

Maybe this has happened to you. You walk into the second floor of Lucas Hall with an agenda: to get to class on time. With two minutes remaining, the hallway is a madhouse filled with students engaged in conversation blocking your path. Other students line the walls waiting for their professors to arrive and unlock the classrooms. You make it to your class at the end of the hall by the drinking fountain, only to discover a sign hanging on the doorway reading, "Professor X's 10:30 class canceled." Sighing, you turn around and begin the trek back down the hall.

You glance at your watch. It reads 10:29. It's too early to eat lunch, and you actually came to school prepared today, so you have no more studying to do. What do you do? You walk towards the doors and notice a sign hanging from one of the classroom doorways. "Gallery 210," you muse, "I've always wondered what was in there...."

Catch the exhibit at Gallery 210 before it closes on April 4. The gallery is excavating "Archeology," a three-dimensional interactive exhibit by local sculptor and Washington University professor Ron Fondaw.

Walking into Gallery 210, you find that many of Fondaw's sculptures swallow up the room. The essence of the first room is contained in smaller sculptures like "Aunt Verna's Lamp" and "Aladdin." The earthy looking masses of clay resemble what would be found at an archeological dig. In "Aunt Verna's Lamp," a porcelain teacup sitting on a stack of saucers, and an old vase, slightly shattered, are somewhat exposed from the chunk of spot-gloss, textured wrap of clay. The clay has a look of freshly dug rock. The dishes look worn but conjure nostalgic images in your mind. This exhibit is not only a representation of an archeological excavation, but also an excavation into the individual's mind.

To the right of the entrance stand three large, layered rectangular glasses. This is "The Wasteland," a collection of mixed media preserved in glass. The idea of a forgotten, or even doomed, world lingers in the memory between the layers of glass. Especially the piece entitled "If Given Another Chance," which sits on a burned sewing cabinet that looks as if it were pulled from a house neighboring Chernobyl during the explosion. Melted-down glass jars border the glass windows looking into what appears to be a swarm of worldly items. Wooden block letters, slides of Jupiter, and sketches of wildlife are scattered between the layers of glass giving the impression of an explosion of a world with many great accomplishments. This leads back to the memory idea that was explored in the smaller sculptures.

One mural not to be overlooked is the "Potato Patch." Your eyes will be immediately drawn to the concentric movement of rocks resembling potatoes. The potatoes spin downward into a black hole. You will move closer to the whole to see what it is made of. You will even reach out to touch it, only to find yourself being sucked into a vortex.

When you come out, you find yourself in another room, cooler, darker, and with the hum of the air conditioner, you feel as if you are in a cerebral "no place," where the memories originate. The walls have a greenish glow. The room is rawer, stripped down with scultures made of glass, and stone. The memories of the former room echo into waves that form the art. You are in another world.

The center of the room's energy lies in "Allooma," a tall cylinder-like sculpture emitting a green hue. A mirror hangs above it, exposing the scientific-looking top composed of green and blue circles. It looks like a sort of futuristic plant. Just one thing, is this room the future, or is it the past?

You'll have time to ponder that as you walk to your next class. Unfortunately, you are not in a time warp, but rather in a small gallery inside Lucas Hall. Due to the escapist quality Fondaw's sculptures bring, you have been sucked into the past, and have lost track of time. You hurry out of the quiet room, facing the body of students head on. Don't worry though, you can return. The Gallery is open 11 a.m. to 5 p.m., Tuesday till Saturday.

What is the funniest April Fool's story that you know?

OUR OPINION

School violence won't stop until parents get involved

Students in schools today are having to learn more than just the basic subjects—now they need to know what to do in the case of a school shooting.

Isolated incidents occurred before the 1990s.

On May 1, 1992, the first in a growing epidemic of school rampages began in Olivehurst, Calif., when Eric Houston, 20, returned to his former high school and killed four and wounded ten in retribution for a failing grade.

The most recent happened March 23 in El Cajon, Calif., when an 18-year old came to school with a 12-gauge shotgun and attempted to gun down the vice principal. No fatalities resulted, however six people—including the gunman—were wounded.

The following day, a significant number of schools reported the usual incidents of threats called, e-mailed, mailed, or sent by other means, resulting in some closings.

These shootings are only the major events in this string of violence in schools.

Many other students have made hit lists, planned shooting sprees, brought guns to schools, as well as threatened faculty and students.

Administrators, authorities, students, parents, faculty and media all debate what exactly should be done to eliminate this rash of violence.

Some suggest increasing metal detectors and police presence. Others offer advice on how to tell the signs of troubled youths before they explode. Some even think that the media is partially for giving these shooters attention for their actions.

One thing for certain: the problem has to be addressed and it's probably not just one particular trend, but a combination of all of them.

It is our opinion that parents should step in and take a greater role in their children's lives. Children learn their first lessons from their parents, as well as the most important lessons from interactions in the home.

When parents take the time to talk with their children and are aware of their daily activities, many of the issues that have caused previous shootings may be dealt with in a more positive manner.

Granite Hills High School, where the March 23 incident took place, has taken the initiative to help both parents and their children to become more involved in each others' lives. They are encouraging parents to attend school with their children on Monday when the school reopens.

Parents who spend quality time and activities (not sitting down and watching television together) will build family bonds and be able to support their children through their problems.

The children of America are its greatest resource and its foundation and hope for the future. Without the love and support of parents for these kids, the future does not appear bright for anyone.

The issue:

The public is debating what should be done to stop the recent rash of school violence. There are many suggestions: increasing metal detectors and police presence, cutting down media coverage, offering advice on dealing with troubled youth, and more.a

We suggest:

Children learn their most important lessons at home, from their parents. Parents need to be more involved and break out of the "send them to daycare" mentality.

So what do you think?

UMSL roads need major repair work

I know everyone is frustrated with the parking situation on campus and so am I. For the past two semesters I have been driving out to UMSL from St. Charles for classes toward a Bachelor of Science in Education degree. Since I am an education major, all my classes are on South Campus. I would just like to draw some attention to the horrible road conditions on South Campus.

It's like driving through a mine field! Everytime I get to school I dread driving on campus for fear my car is going to be swallowed by one of the gigantic holes in the road. I am sure that others who go to South Campus for classes can understand my frustration! I know that right now, the big issue is parking fees for new garages, but let's try and get these roads in better shape! I mean give me a break—I-70 is in better shape than the roads on campus! In my opinion, if we are going to have to pay outrageous fees to park on this campus, we deserve at least to have decent roads to drive on.

Spring break flies by, much the way life does

Since I started going to college, Spring Break usually hasn't been too exciting. But just as this year's week-long vacation had all but slipped through my fingers, I was reminded that it wasn't always this way.

I remember in high school going to Taylor University each year for a Christian youth conference. The conferences happened close to spring break on a weekend. My friend Doug invited me to go during my freshman year even though he attended a different school. At first I wasn't so sure, but Doug was a persistent fellow, and one of my favorite bands was going to be doing a concert that weekend.

And so we went. I had never experienced anything like it. We stayed in college dorms with college kids. More than 1000 high schoolers invaded Taylor that year. We were divided into small groups. Each group had a number and two college leaders took pride in decorating elaborate signs, each one playing off the number they'd been assigned.

The conferences were great because we talked about all different sorts of life issues, and we also got a taste of college life. During our free time, we could pretty much go anywhere and do anything we wanted on campus. We got to talk with the college kids and find out what it was like. We got to eat college food. I wasn't particularly fond of the showers in the dorm we stayed in the first year, but it was something different.

The second year, I transferred to the same high school Doug was at. Before long, he had gotten me involved in the Young Life group on campus. Our circle of friends from YL grew, and we all began going on the youth conference trips together. Each year we took more people than the year before.

As I was pondering how I let spring break this year whiz by so quickly, it occurred to me how long ago those trips were. I'm in my third year of college. I could easily now be one of those student leaders.

And in a way, I guess I am. In a couple months, one of my staff members—Nick Bowman—will be replacing me as the big chief of The Current. You can read his story in this issue. I got a kick out of seeing that story, because Nick talks about how I will be his teacher for the rest of the year.

Time sure does fly. It wasn't so long ago that I was in Nick's shoes, trying to soak up what I could from Joe Harris, my predecessor.

I suppose it won't be long before I'll be in his shoes again, gunning for a "real" job, doing my best to learn the nuances. I can't go back to the past. But that's okay. There's plenty of future ahead of me.

Slavery reparations ad raises free speech issue

Freedom: the meaning of the word is the basis on which the founding fathers built this country.

With freedom comes responsibility, and the obligations to defend and understand it.

Many people, although they may not realize it, have spoken against the First Amendment. This happens when they attempt to censor various groups holding opposite views.

For example, I do not in any way defend the views of the Ku Klux Klan. But I do defend their right to free speech.

If they want to air a television program (and if they can find a station that will air it), that is their right under the First Amendment to the Constitution. Because this show is on, that does not mean that I have to watch it, and that is my right, also protected by the Constitution.

This ordinarily would not be such a headline issue because it is so acceptable to censor ideas that the majority of the population does not endorse.

Because of a man by the name of David Horowitz, a political conservative, the meaning of freedom has become highly publicized in papers such as the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, the Washington Post and San Francisco Chronicle.

Horowitz created an advertisement called "Ten Reasons Why Reparations for Slavery Is a Bad Idea—and Racist, Too."

This advertisement, because of the low budget (Horowitz claims) was submitted to be run in 100 college papers. We have not received it at The Current. The other reason Horowitz offers is the pure atmosphere of colleges as centers of learning, debate and educational experimentation.

Most of the papers declined to run the ad because of its controversial nature. Four agreed to publish it and of those, three ran apologies.

With February as the month to run the ad, Horowitz chose an impeccable time—Black History Month.

The real reason, I speculate, was to test the liberal tendencies of college newspapers and educational facilities to see if they would run the ad, just because they could, without regard to their readers and their views.

The papers that did publish faced great protest from their communities.

This is my opinion of protests, addressed to those who complained: Look at the advertisement and find its faults. Write letters to the editor and present your side. Don't steal papers or burn them, and don't protest the paper itself.

The paper does not hold the views reflected in its ads. The paper has it right not to print an ad it considers controversial. That paper has the same right to run that ad, if it chooses.

If at The Current we have an ad the said a particular jeweler was the best, that does not mean the staff feels that way. Remember that it is an advertisement. Because you read it that, does not mean you have believe it or even like it.

And this represents the true definition of freedom of speech—to be able to support and defend what you believe without harming others or censoring their views.

This is why America was created and still survives today.

Lions' roar becomes kittens' purr

UMSL Rivermen slide by Lindenwood U. with 4-3 win in extra innings

BY NICK BOWMAN
staff writer

For many collegiate baseball players, the prospect of playing a game in front of the lights at a professional baseball park is a dream far from reality.

But for the UMSL Rivermen, the dream came true, at least for one night, as UMSL took on Lindenwood University at T.R. Hughes Baseball Park in O'Fallon.

"It was great to be able to play at T.R. Hughes," said head coach Jim Brady. "Anytime you can play in a setting like that, you've got to get excited."

The game, however, was less than stellar for the Rivermen as they squeezed a 4-3 win out of the Lions in extra innings.

"Sometimes a win is a win, and we played just good enough to win," said Brady.

UMSL jumped to an early lead in the first inning, with Brody Jackson taking a sacrifice out to score Bryan Beckmann for the game's first run. Lindenwood responded in the bottom of the inning, scoring in similar fashion and evening the game 1-1.

Lindenwood took control of the contest in the fourth inning on a solo home run off the bat of Oscar Bernazard, and added to the lead in the fifth inning as Bernazard batted in Juan Rios to take a 3-1 lead.

UMSL responded with a hot bat in the seventh inning with Brett Katz knocking a solo homerun shot to right-center and Buddy Simon hit another solo homer in the same direction to tie the score at 3-3 heading into the eighth. Katz again came through for the Rivermen, scoring the go-ahead run from a line drive to right and giving the Rivermen a 4-3 lead.

Greg Bierling, who was credited with the win, retired the Lions in order in the bottom of the eight and Keith Wallace did the same in the ninth, recording his second save of the season and securing a 4-3 UMSL victory.

With the victory, the Rivermen improved to 8-7 on the year and will head into conference play above the .500 mark. But 8-7 is far from the expectations of this team according to Brady.

"So far we've been a bit of a let-down," said Brady. "I expected a

Basketball Rivermen take stock of season, look forward

BY NICK BOWMAN
staff writer

Since taking the helm of the men's basketball program at UMSL, Mark Bernsen has slowly seen his alma mater rise from the cellar of the Great Lakes Valley Conference to a perennial post-season team.

In 1999, Bernsen took a team that was coming off of a six-win campaign and sent it to the conference tournament. This season, Bernsen sent that same team to the post-season armed with a .500 record and a No. 6 seed, the highest such finish since UMSL joined the GLVC. Although UMSL was ousted in the first round of both tournaments, there is no denying that this is definitely a team on the rise.

"We've been accomplishing our goals in these seasons," said Bernsen. "This season, we wanted to finish above .500 (the Rivermen finished 14-13) and we wanted to qualify for the GLVC tournament. We accomplished both of those goals and next year, we'll work on that."

The team is beginning to gain recognition within the conference. Two senior Rivermen, Greg Ross and Michael Coleman, received honorable mention berths on the GLVC All-Conference Team. The team is voted on by the coaches of the GLVC.

Ross led the team in scoring this year with a 14.9 average. He also led in total assists with 62 and steals with 43. His scoring average also placed him among the top 15 in the GLVC. Coleman placed 11th in the GLVC in rebounding with an average of 6.4 per game, while still scoring an average 11.1 per contest.

"If you're going to have any success in any sport, you're going to have to have the players," said Bernsen. "If we can build on their

Riverwomen wind up with back-to-back losses to Truman

Darren Brune The Current

Kelly Jackson prepares to deliver a pitch at a recent game against Lewis. The Riverwomen lost two games to Truman State prior to facing Lewis.

BY TOM WEATHERSBY
special to The Current

The UMSL women's softball team was swept in a doubleheader at Truman State on March 21, losing the first game 7-2 and then dropping the second game 8-1.

In the first game Truman State got on the board first, scoring a run on a single in the second inning. In the third, Truman added another run, bringing the lead to 3-0. The Riverwomen were unable to counter the score.

In the fifth inning Truman State unloaded four runs off starter Megan Kuebler, to blow the game wide open and push the lead to 7-0. Head Coach Lesa Boneé was not happy after game one as the Riverwomen could not manage to get any runs.

"If anything, Truman is a very, very good team that's ranked nationally," Boneé said. "They are a great team, but we didn't play well mentally at all. We had mental breakdowns on our defensive coverage."

Truman State was able to capitalize on UMSL's breakdowns.

"That's what was so frustrating," Boneé said. "If we would have played better defensively, we might have had a chance to win. We did play better in the second game. We just couldn't get the offense going."

The Riverwomen did get two runs in the top half of the seventh, on the hot bats of Christine Langenbacher and Kelly Jackson. Langenbacher singled with one out and Jackson hit her third home run of the season to make the score 7-2, which is how the game ended. Jackson and Langenbacher continued to swing the bat well.

"I just go up and try to put the ball in play," Jackson said. "I don't go to the plate looking for hits."

In the second game, Truman State again started off by jumping on top 1-0 on a single in the first inning. In the top of the third, UMSL tied the game 1-1 and scored on Jackson's double to give the Riverwomen their only run of the game.

"We couldn't get the offense and defense to click together," Jackson said. "It was like the offense was up here and the defense was down. We need to play an even game."

Jackson is hitting .432 with a slugging percentage of .784. Langenbacher, Andrea Wirkus, Chrissy Griefe and Allison Maurer follow with all batting at least .330.

Truman State added a run in the bottom of the third and kept the Riverwomen silenced. In the fourth and fifth innings, Truman State hung three more runs on the Riverwomen in each inning. The Riverwomen eventually fell 8-1.

"When our offense gets going we're gonna be tough," Boneé said. "But we have to prepare mentally. It's just our mental game we'll have to improve or I'll have to find players who can. You can't have mental breakdowns, especially against teams like Truman. We have conference play beginning. We have to do better."

"We have to be ready to take the field," Langenbacher said. "Conference is starting. We have to be ready to play mentally. Coach got on us and we have to do better."

These two losses brought the Riverwomen down to 6-6 on the season, with the team now concentrating on successful conference play.

UMSL sports must push harder to make playoffs

DAVE KINWORTHY

Welcome back from Spring Break, fellow students. It is spring season and the baseballs and softballs, along with tennis balls, are hitting mid-stream right now.

The Rivermen and Riverwomen in the sports of baseball, softball and tennis are currently in the middle of their seasons and all teams are quite competitive. The Great Lakes Valley Conference is no joke and anyone who follows the Rivermen and Riverwomen should know that now is the time to make a push to the front.

The men's baseball team is hopefully hitting their full potential, ever since getting off to a .500 season at 7-7. Jim Brady, in his tenure as the UMSL baseball head coach, has never, in the past four years since I have been here, gotten off to such a slow start. But do not worry fellow athletic department, heavy breathers and critics. Coach Brady will make this team succeed and the passion that he has for the game itself will not get away from him this season. No matter who says that the men's baseball team may not have what it takes this season with their slow start, Brady will answer the critics with a huge second half of the season. No Rivermen's baseball team will ever fail with Brady at the helm and as the defending Great Lakes Valley Conference champions, UMSL will rally this second part of the season.

The women's softball team got off to a great start this season under Lisa Boneé, but lately have failed to sweep both games in their doubleheaders. The team may lack that one dominant pitcher (like Kathleen Rogaz) for now, but Meghan Kuebler is coming on strong as of late and has rallied this team on her back.

The softball program, at 9-11 overall and 2-2 in the GLVC, has to have a strong second half of the season under this new team. When I say new, I mean not a young team, but rather a group of junior college players along with select players from last season's team. The group had a great fall season, but needs to play like they have the desire to win the close conference ball games. Andrea Wirkus, the NCAA Division II leader in triples last year, is a proven winner with the Riverwomen and if anything, she will not allow the Riverwomen to falter down the stretch run this season.

The biggest and yet the least surprising aspect of this spring season is the men's tennis program. Head Coach Rick Gyllenborg has done a great job ever since he took over the program. The men's team thus far has a 5-2 overall record, with only one conference loss to Southern Indiana, a dominant team who came into the contest at 11-2 overall and were the winners of the conference last season.

The goal this year for the Rivermen has been to oust Indianapolis and this team has what it takes to do it. With a young Matt Vaulkhard at No. 1 singles, the veterans of Josh Heape, Minh Phan, Eric Schruppf and Ryan Trela will all have to be at their best when the Rivermen make their run at the No. 2 position in the conference.

Epic duel captivates audiences in 'Enemy at the Gates'

BY TIM THOMPSON
staff writer

Military history buffs and moviegoers enticed by drama and adventure alike, will have a sense of fulfillment after viewing "Enemy at the Gates." Starring Jude Law, Ed Harris, Joseph Fiennes, Rachel Weisz and Bob Hoskins, "Enemy At The Gates" keeps the audience mystified at the incredible courage of two snipers determined to eliminate one another in the midst of a ferocious battle that is deciding the course of world history.

The setting is the autumn of 1942, when Hitler's Nazi Germany is at the apex of its power. German forces dominate most of Europe, and Russia is on the verge of collapse.

The Nazis have struck repeated massive blows at the Russians, forcing them back to a small industrial city on the Volga River named Stalingrad.

The movie opens with a spectacular series of dramatic scenes depicting the ignorance of Russian commanders who hurl their troops at the Germans like pigs being led to the slaughter.

The film also accurately portrays the chaotic situation at the Stalingrad docks, where soldiers trying to defend the city become hopelessly entangled with civilians desperate to leave.

One of the most riveting scenes takes place on the boat trip across the Volga, when makeshift Russian troop ships are strafed by Stuka Dive Bombers from the Luftwaffe's Third Airfleet. In order to avoid the German planes, some Russian soldiers leap into the river and are promptly shot by their own sadistic officers.

These initial episodes leave the audience mesmerized. The authenticity is grand and the camera work astonishing.

The setting of Stalingrad itself is also brilliantly recreated. In the real battle, the city was leveled by thousands of Luftwaffe aircraft, and by the autumn of 1942, had been reduced to

Sally's folly: the crack in 'Talley's Folly'

BY EMILY UMBRIGHT
staff writer

Theatre-goers of the Repertory Theatre escaped into the World War II home-front in Lanford Wilson's "Talley's Folly," directed by Steve Woolf, on Friday March 16. The play runs through April 13.

What began as a slice of American life in a time of war kept alive with victory gardens, war bonds, and women joining the work force, ended with the audience's total engrossment in the psychology of two separate individuals who attract and repel each other into states of confusion.

The dimming of the house lights blurs the distinction between the audience's reality and the actors' reality. Matt Friedman, played by Geoffrey Cantor, delivers his opening monologue in an engagingly comical manner, giving the audience the grand tour of the set. He confronts the audience head on, laying out the center of Lebanon, Mo., in relation to the boathouse where the play takes place. He illustrates the artificiality of the play by explaining how reflections of the moon are created with stage lights. However, he also says that he is not a romantic, which as the play proves is not all together true. Matt's opening monologue extends his reality to include his audience, who in turn thin their suspension of disbelief.

Matt's awareness of the audience seems to dissolve with the appearance of his romantic interest, Sally Talley, played by Kelly McAndrew. Crickets chirp in the background, an occasional frog croaks, the moon rises, giving the illusion of time passing by. The audience is still with Matt but he forgets. The moment the couple engages in conversation, the audience becomes mere spectators in Matt's attempt to "waltz" with Sally while she clings to her identity.

The set, designed like a horseshoe, is perfect for staging conversational interaction between the two characters, who at times stand on opposite sides of the set with a creek running between them. Matt refers to the evening as a waltz because when he advances to her mentally, she pulls away. He brings up a valid point about human nature, in that each individual is a metaphoric egg who, at times, bumps into another egg but desperately protects the shell from being cracked. What Matt does not know is that while he protects his yoke from being splattered onto the dock, Sally is doing the same.

The audience can see that the two characters are perfect for each other. Matt, the book-smart Jewish account-tant from St. Louis who plays off the stereotypes but cannot bring himself to enlist in the war, desires the rural simplicity that Sally represents. Sally, the street-smart farm girl, dreams of living in a place with less ignorance and wants out. Despite the roles they play, Matt is really the dreamer, and Sally is really the pragmatic one. Matt makes reference to his love for puzzles repeatedly, and these two fill in each other's gaps perfectly. There is one problem, however. If they are such a good match, why does she continue to push him away?

Throughout the evening, the emotions swing from expressions of love to alienation. They dance taking turns moving two steps forward and a step back, with Matt getting closer to his goal of cracking Sally's shell and hoping to obtain her to acceptance of his marriage proposal. She demands that he leave her boathouse, which he does, but not without attacking her lack of nostalgia first. At this moment, a band in the distance begins playing which causes her to follow him with her eyes. Just her look prevents him from leaving, and again, the dance begins.

Skeletons are exposed and the audience finds their characters vic-

'The Caveman's Valentine' is standard Samuel L. Jackson

BY RHASHAD PITTMAN
staff writer

Samuel L. Jackson may have slightly changed his look from a more clean-cut appearance to that of a rougher, thick-bearded, and dreadlocked schizophrenic homeless man, but his onscreen presence and persona have hardly changed at all in his new movie "The Caveman's Valentine."

The film is based on a 1994 Edgar Award-winning novel by George Dawes Green and directed by Kasi Lemmons, whose first effort was an artsy New Orleans-based film, called "Eve's Bayou," also starring Jackson.

Jackson plays Romulus Ledbetter, a former Juilliard piano student who is living in a cave at a New York park. When Ledbetter encounters a life-changing valentine hanging from a tree right outside of his "home," the suspense ride begins.

The former pianist Romulus transforms into a detective and goes on a witch hunt for the killer despite his reoccurring mental battles with a powerful character in his mind called Styvesant. The hunt ultimately leads to a well-known photographer, David Lepperaub (played by Colm Feore), who takes photos of people who are in pain and have been suffering from it for years.

Jackson's performance is as excellent as always, as his central character carries the artful movie and its well-written script to the heights of upper-class New York society and back down to the common folk and the lower-class world. Somewhere in between, danger permeates throughout both worlds, combining them into a hellish, colorful ride through the mind of Romulus.

Jackson plays the part as well as anyone could. He takes it to its limit, but doesn't go any further than his usual trademark dramatic roller-coaster persona. I like his style, the calm warning of his rising voice to a thun-

Reynolds returns in 'Be Careful What You Pray For'

BY KIMBERLY SILVER
special to the current

Lisa G. Reynolds returned to the Gateway City last weekend with her own original play, "Be Careful What You Pray For," at the Fox Theatre. Her play combines comedy, drama and music to minister to the audience. The play is about Samantha Stuart, a teenage girl with an amazing voice who discovers what she believes to be love and prosperity outside of her Christian home. She ends up marrying 29-year-old Bobby Wallace. This man is sexy, rich and powerful. Everything a girl prays for right? Wrong! It turns out that her new husband does not have Christ in his life. Deep inside, he is full of rage and truly miserable. Young Samantha suffers because her husband makes her just as miserable. Painfully she learns that no one and nothing can stand without Christ. Not even a marriage.

The young Samantha soon finds herself in a mentally and physically abusive marriage. Her hilarious friends, Michael and Carmen, try to rescue her but to no avail. Through the power of prayer, by herself, her family and her friends, she is delivered from her terrible situation. "Be Careful What You Pray For" serves as a highly effective wake up call. If you allow its message to reach your heart, it simply reminds you that "all that glitters ain't gold."

Lisa Reynolds put her heart into writing this play. It was so powerful that one minute the performers had you falling out of your chair with laughter and the next minute the sheer intensity had you hanging on to the edge of your seat.

The musical performances are simply amazing. Shirley Murdock's has a rich voice that carries you deep into the plot of the play. Cuba Gooding Sr., who plays Samantha's protective father, is equally effective.

Almost the entire cast has incredible vocal ability, which contributes to the quality of the play. The costumes are dazzling. Shirley Murdock glides around in satin pajamas that are nothing short of royal. Later, she appears on stage decked out in a gorgeous cranberry red, three-piece silk suit that would make even the most fashion savvy woman want to run to out Dillard's and recreate the image for herself. But wait a minute! The fellas were equally impressive. Cuba Gooding Sr. could easily grace the cover of GQ. We definitely will not forget bad-boy Bobby Wallace, who looks like he could be tucked away in the pages of Ebony magazine. Hats off to the costume managers and stylists.

During intermission, playwright and former Fox Theatre employee Lisa G. Reynolds was honored for her work. Ten years ago, she created

For my column this week, I'm taking the week off. If you're expecting a really coherent column, you can probably stop reading right now, and get back to class. It's not happening. Mentally, I'm on spring break.

By the time you read this, spring break will be over but as I write this, spring break has not yet begun. In order for you to read this on the first day after the end of spring break, this article had to be written before we all took off for warmer climes (if you were lucky enough to go to Florida over the break) or took off for more work hours (if you were unlucky enough to be too broke to leave town). And even Current staffers get spring break, too, although I'm not going anywhere myself.

The result is that some of the topics I could have written about are in the future for me but in the past for you. As I write this, I don't know yet who won the Academy Awards. The St. Louis Film Festival's Best of Fest mini festival hasn't yet taken place. "Josie and the Pussy Cats" hasn't yet opened in theaters. OK, so maybe some of these events are more interesting than others.

Getting away from the movie theme, I also don't know what's happened in the news over the intervening week. Maybe the stock market bounces back. Maybe they find mad cow disease in New Jersey. Maybe they'll find Russell Crowe has mad cow disease - no, wait, now I'm back to movies.

I'm sure more announcements about finding new genes will be made, although no one could guess which ones will be uncovered. I'm sure stories about the spread of hoof and mouth disease are still running.

Although I'll be in town for spring break, I'm hoping to have a little "down time" to do a little goofing off. In this highly efficient world, quality goofing off is very underrated. I'm planning on sleeping late at least once, and doing something purely for the entertainment value to myself, like read an interesting new book or finally go see the Van Gogh exhibit at the Art Museum, or hear Ptah Williams play fabulous jazz piano at Riddle's Cafe, or watch some silly video or DVD I've already seen dozens of times. Or maybe I'll try to figure out "the Sims" on my computer. Probably, I'll wind up doing more productive and useful things than this, but hey, a girl can dream, can't she?

I hope everyone did something they enjoyed over spring break, even if it was just making more money for the serious-minded. Hopefully, the weather was nice enough that everyone could get outside a bit, and feel like spring is finally getting here. Crocuses are coming up in my front yard right now, and will probably be fading out by the time you read this, as daffodils are starting to come up.

Welcome back to campus. Say, what did I miss over Spring Break?

Three bands make more noise

BY CHARLIE BRIGHT
staff writer

Jamie wasn't in any of the three bands that rocked the Savvis Center on March 21, but she was a perfect example of what is right with today's music. The fans who came to see Lifehouse, Everclear, and Matchbox Twenty spanned from groupies to screaming girls, but everyone had a blast.

Jamie was a groupie, a whistling, screaming fan with aspirations to get backstage. She knew where the band was sleeping, what their bus looked like, and everything else she needed to get her own personal experience from the concert. She wasn't alone.

Thousands of people came to the concert, and when Lifehouse opened the show, there was a level of excitement and anticipation that usually precedes only the biggest acts. Performing songs from their album, No Name Face, Lifehouse rocked the audience, even though a large number of Matchbox Twenty fans wouldn't show up for an hour or more.

Lifehouse had a short set, but one that showed its strong roots as a jam band in California. Jason Wade, the band's twenty-year-old lead singer, gave a spectacular performance despite ill health that would leave him recuperating for days.

After a brief interlude, Everclear took the stage behind by storm. Art Alexakis, the band's highly recognizable frontman, rocked the stage with a large group of St. Louisans. Crowding Alexakis, one large fan came up to the microphone and jumped around until escorted from the stage.

Afterward, Everclear's lead singer told the audience, "Man! I thought that guy was gonna grab me and have his way with me!"

The audience hungrily devoured Everclear's tunes, joining in for popular classics like "Santa Monica" and "Father of Mine." Alexakis has recently been lauded for his socially conscious image, attending a congressional hearing on the abandonment of children. At the hearing, he explained the message behind "Father of Mine," which is the story of his own youth. Enthusiasm for Everclear and the band's message was clearly in abundance with the crowd that had now grown to fill the entire Savvis Center.

Matchbox Twenty rose to meet the challenge of high expectations built by the two fantastic opening acts. Performing hits from their first Atlantic album, Yourself Or Someone Like You, the band continued the crowd involvement Everclear began.

With a slightly softer sound, Matchbox Twenty let the audience listen and sing quietly to the music, rather than shouting over the pandemonium as it had been forced to do only minutes earlier.

The band changed its name for their newer album, making Mad Season the second album produced by the band, but the first after changing the numeric "20" to "Twenty." The change didn't seem to affect the fans, who were every bit as excited by songs from the new album as the band's classics. The applause for the recent "If You're Gone" was probably louder, and certainly more sustained, than any single Blues goal the Savvis Center has seen. That's not a knock against hockey fans, just the crowd's honest reaction to great live music.

Truly shining were the encores, in which Matchbox Twenty's Rob Thomas played an acoustic guitar and serenaded the audience into a hushed respectful silence. A shared and awesome stage presence brought the concert together, and made all three bands look great. Jamie thought so, and so did thousands of other shrieking happy fans. Lifehouse, Everclear, or Matchbox Twenty would each be a great stand-alone act, but combining them made for a single night of absolute entertainment.

a heap of rubble, a fact that is vividly displayed by director Jean-Jacques Annaud.

The producers of this film also went to great lengths acquiring exact replicas of German tanks, trucks, half-tracks, guns, and uniforms, something which augments the historical flare of any war flick.

About 40 minutes into "Enemy At The Gates," the film begins to focus on the legendary duel between snipers Vassili Zaitsev, played by Jude Law, and Walther Koenig, played by Ed Harris.

Zaitsev, the Russian sharpshooter, is sending chills up and down the spine of every German soldier in Stalingrad. He runs up an incredible kill total and is made into a national hero by Sergei Danilov, a young political officer who convinces Nikita Khrushchev, played by Bob Hoskins, to publish stories of Zaitsev's heroics.

Hoskins does a credible job with his portrayal of Khrushchev, showing how ruthless and crude the future Soviet Premier could be.

derous yelling of damning words, but it's getting old. He doesn't transcend the role and make me forget that he's Ledbetter and not Jackson. He sparks some good laughs, then becomes very serious and loud, and is always intriguing. But that's nothing new from his other movies.

Although I know that at times his dramatic spectrum of actions is necessary—and that they are part of his trademark style—I would like for Jackson to surprise me a little bit. He's starting to get predictable.

Joe Garrett Productions, saying she was "hoping to uplift and entertain the African-American community through the art of theatre." "Be Careful What You Pray For" has successfully been on tour for over three years. Reynolds modestly accepted her award and commented, "You can do anything you set your mind to."

tims of reality. Sally is a victim of an arranged marriage, American style, initiated by her father, partial owner of a factory, and by the father of her high school sweetheart, who happens to be the other owner of the said factory. Matt is a victim of racial bigotry. The audience discovers that his family was ripped apart while wandering Europe trying to find a country that would accept them. Matt and Sally—two blue speckled eggs in an abandoned nest.

"Talley's Folly" is a play that relates to its audience members. Despite the characters' somewhat dramatic psychological makeup, the play exposes a truth about human nature in that everyone has a yoke that they protect. Rather than trying to relate to the audience's reality, Sally and Matt allow the audience into their own, proving that truth transcends beyond the dramatic sphere.

'A Heartbreaking Work' lives up to its name

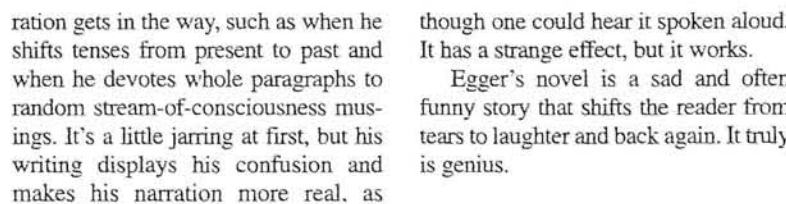

BY SARA PORTER
staff writer

I have to admit that when I first heard the title of "A Heartbreaking Work of Staggering Genius," I thought one of three things a) the author is really conceited b) it's a parody making fun of what critics would say about the book or c) he's hopeful that critics will say that about the book. Having read the novel, I can say it's d) none of the above. Instead, author Dave Eggers gives a humorous and, yes, sometimes heartbreaking account of a young man suddenly orphaned.

When Eggers was twenty-one, he lost both of his parents to cancer in the course of five weeks. The novel mostly deals with his later years, moving to San Francisco, founding a satire magazine, "Might," and raising his younger brother, Toph, who was seven at the time of their parents' death.

The novel is hilarious in many places, such as his work on "Might," which he conceded was a "staff of five in a broom closet." It also deals with the everyday annoyances that first time parents encounter, such as fighting with his little brother over chores and his constant fear when the boy is out of his sight.

It's also very moving in many chapters. Egger's real emotions show when describing the deaths of his parents, especially his mother's, and his strong affections for Toph, and the near deaths of two of his friends, one in a car accident and one by attempted suicide. Despite the heavy handedness of the plot, Eggers never gives any mawkish narration, instead appearing ironic and slightly satirical in his narration but displaying the emotions underneath.

The 10 best movies of Y2K

Mock trial team comes out on top after year of struggles

BY RHASHAD PITTMAN
staff writer

After a year of frustrating times with team members quitting, a lack of funding for expenses, and numerous other hassles, UMSL's mock trial team triumphed their trials by competing in the American Mock Trial Association's (AMTA) national competition this March in St. Paul, Minn., in only their second year of existence. "That's a very impressive feat," said Mike Johnson, publicity chairperson of AMTA's Board of Directors. "We don't have many teams to do that. The last one I can remember that did it was Harvard."

And even though UMSL's team didn't make it to the national championship in Des Moines, Iowa, they've developed experience and skills that will last a lifetime.

In all his 16 years as an educator and 20 years as an attorney, Johnson says that he's never found a program that has so many benefits for students, such as "teaching students the ability to think quickly, adaptability,...(and) teamwork," he said.

"It's probably the single most beneficial educational opportunity that they will participate in," Johnson said.

For future lawyers, "You can't beat it for preparation to go to law school," he added.

This year's UMSL's mock trial team consisted of team president Matthew La Martina, treasurer Danielle Smith, Lakisha Dowd, Jennifer Suedmeyer, Charlie Rosene, Homecoming Queen April Cline, Michael White, and Gina Mitten.

With endless hours of preparation behind them, the eight-member team competed in a real-life trial format against teams from all over the country, first at Washington University earlier in the year at a regional tournament, then at the national level in the chilly, northern city of St. Paul.

On the last day of the tournament at the awards banquet, one surprised team member stood in complete astonishment with her eyebrows raised and her mouth wide open when her name was called.

Mitten, one of four first-year members, came home with All-American status for her role as an attorney in the competition. It was the only award UMSL received.

"Once they got to the higher-rank categories I thought my chances were shot," she said. "I couldn't believe it. I couldn't believe it."

As a whole, the team was successful just to qualify at such a high level so quickly.

In the midst of their jubilant journey, the Cinderella team was fortunate to have a coach that brought championship experience with him.

Steve Caliendo, a Political Science Professor, coached the Purdue University mock trial team to the championship competition in Des Moines in the 1997-1998 school year.

His experience was essential in the national competition, where UMSL and about 46 other colleges and universities went at it like the powerhouses at the NCAA basketball tournament that was simultaneously underway. Ironically, the mock trial national championship competition in Des Moines would feature the top 64 teams nationwide, like the NCAA basketball tournament does.

Seasoned teams with strong mock-trial traditions like Yale University, Syracuse University, and University of California-Berkeley were competing. Local schools such as Saint Louis University and University of Illinois were also in the tournament.

Most of UMSL's competitors had major advantages over the home team like school funding that provided roundtrip airfare for the team, and money set aside to pay local attorneys for their insight and coaching. UMSL primarily raised most of their own money through alumni and local judges and attorneys. Their local attorney coaches, Chuck Caisely and Matt Devoti, volunteered their time. The University did provide hotel expenses and a rented van for the trip at practically last-minute notice.

Either way, the whole experience was something they'll probably never forget, even through those treacherous years of law school. Just being able to meet and receive pointers from people like Edward Toussaint Jr., a classy judge of the Minnesota Court of Appeals, and Andrea George, an insightful federal criminal defense attorney, was worth the struggle.

"I've seen a lot of sterling arguments," Toussaint said, reflecting on his years of judging collegiate mock trial competitions. "The competition is pretty high."

"There are some students that I'm absolutely amazed are students," George said, adding that some of the students she witnessed had "the presence of a professional" and were, at times, even more prepared.

The entire competition consisted of four rounds for each team, which was basically a trial each round that lasted about three hours. The trial was based on a case concerning the death of a man who was trying to summit Mount Everest, the tallest mountain in the world at over 29,000 feet. The man's spouse later sued the tour service that led the summit, claiming their negligence caused her husband's death. It was a harder case for the plaintiff than for the defense, most agreed.

UMSL faced off against Texas A&M, Loras College in Iowa, Ohio Northern University, and Holy Cross College.

Looking back on the tournament during their 10-hour drive back home, the majority of the team members agreed that Holy Cross was their toughest competitor, mostly because of their lead attorney, who had been participating in mock trial competitions since the sixth grade. He would later be named an All-American attorney.

The judges that presided over each round based their score on every aspect of the trial: the opening and closing statements, the direct and cross examinations, and the witnesses' performances. UMSL won their first round, against Texas A&M, but lost their next three.

One of UMSL's plaintiff attorneys, Suedmeyer, who recently graduated with plans of attending Baylor University's law school, is content with her team's performance.

"Since this is our second year, I think we did pretty well," Suedmeyer said.

"Success depends on team chemistry," she added. "We have to be able to mesh at all times in all situations."

Dowd, a prosecuting attorney and witness on the team, says that as a witness facing drilling, unexpected questions, it was all about "mindset."

"I only had to know one thing," she said, "know my part inside and out."

As both an attorney and witness, Dowd stressed how important it was not to get the facts of the case mixed up.

"That could be devastating for your side," she said.

Michael White, a Political Science major like many of his teammates, said that he thought the team did well, especially with such little support from the University.

"We shouldn't have to fight our own people to do well," White said. "the school is constantly complaining about students not coming together...but when we do they don't want to support it."

"It just felt like everything was a struggle," Mitten added.

Darren Brune/ The Current

Nick Bowman will take over as editor in chief of The Current on the first day of intersession. Bowman is a sophomore double-majoring in communication theory and English rhetoric.

New Current editor to emphasize personnel

BY DAN GALLI
special to The Current

Joe Harris, a former editor in chief of The Current, told Nick Bowman shortly after he was hired that he would one day be an editor. On March 19, these words proved prophetic as Bowman was officially approved by the University Assembly Student Affairs and Student Publications Committee to be the next editor in chief of the paper.

Bowman is a sophomore double-majoring in communication theory and English rhetoric.

He has been working in the sports department of The Current for two years. He became an associate editor in spring 2000, and has also covered high school sports for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Bowman's main goal is to fill all four positions for section editors, which will be vacant when the school year ends.

"That is my toughest challenge in the next few weeks, filling the holes in the staff," Bowman said.

He hopes to institute a ladder system to make it easier to replace staff members in the future.

"[Staff members] will work their way through the ropes. When people leave, someone will take their spot," Bowman said. "This will cut a lot of holes and the paper will run a lot smoother."

Bowman's other main goal is to increase distribution of the paper. He wants off-campus distribution to other campuses in the area and also to the community. His goal is to be able to deliver the paper throughout the surrounding area.

"We can then tell advertisers we advertise in the community. We hope to be able to raise ad rates by 10 percent. These rates have not been raised in 10 years. The Current can then come out on top as far as revenue goes," Bowman said.

He hopes to continue the current success of the paper and will be working closely with present editor in chief Josh Renaud. Bowman, who said he views the paper as "another classroom," plans on being a student to Renaud the rest of the semester.

"If I don't try to learn as much as I can now, I will set myself up to fail," Bowman said. "As solid as the paper is now, as when I came on to the staff, I can only see it getting better."

Bowman will officially begin his duties on the first day of intersession.

ed and that they worked on. So there was some compromise."

The policy will take effect August 6, and already UMSL is preparing for it, though it isn't expected to be used much on this campus.

"That's just the nature of having an older student body," Grace said. "We went ahead and started to order some of the material [March 23] because we have to get it ready for the summer."

Flees said that ASUM would continue supporting proposed state legislation that would keep UM from implementing a parental notification policy.

"I'm not sure how much effort we'll put into it," Flees said, "because usually the legislators will go on the Curators' recommendations or their policies.

"Obviously we were disappointed by the overall decision, but the Curators did what was best and now we have to respect their wishes. We'll see how it works out."

Grace said he enjoyed the discussion at the Board of Curators meeting and the Academic Affairs Committee meeting beforehand.

"It was one of the best discussions of a very controversial issue that I've seen in a long time," he said. "Regardless of what side [they represented], I was proud of the way the students were organized and how eloquent they were."

"Health care is so expensive in the United States," said Ellis. "They're trying to keep the cost down."

Unlike doctors, Ellis said, nurses are paid out of the very hospital bill that the government is trying to keep down.

Ellis and Durham both think that legislators will be forced to do something about this insufficient salary.

"I think they are going to have to look at [raising salaries] at least," said Ellis. "They're probably going to have to do something about health care in general."

New nurses burn out quickly because they often have to work 60-70 hours a week, said Ellis. Ellis said that where nurses used to care for five patients who were not deathly ill, they now care for eight to ten patients who are nearly all deathly ill.

"They're dropping out faster than they used to," said Ellis.

"In short, nursing is the backbone of the healthcare industry, but it has not been rewarded, so most women are turning away," said Durham.

The College of Nursing is holding a conference May 11. Peter Beurhaus, the nation's top expert on nursing workforce issues, will address this problem at the conference.

errors as well," he said.

Thaman said that some of the families were probably not aware of the state requirements and may have just been anxious to send their children to a new school that they heard was opening up. St. Louis Charter School, 5247 Flyer Ave., had similar problems with unknowing parents, he added.

"A lot of that is just part of being new and getting all that sorted out,"

Thaman said.

Despite the problems, Thaman is pleased that so many parents are interested in charter schools.

"The interest is definitely there," he said.

Bob Samples, director of University Communications, said that UMSL has contacted officials at both Beacon and Thurgood Marshall Academy to find out "what corrective measures they intend to take," he said.

"We have several issues that we are working on with Thurgood Marshall [Academy]," Samples said. "We are waiting on a response from all those issues."

Samples decline to comment on what those issues were.

"We've received some phone calls from parents and we're just following up on them," he said.

Alcatraz occupies unique place in history of U.S. prisons

Twenty-eight years ago, this month marked the end of an era in the U.S. prison system. For on March 21, 1963, the final group of prisoners embarked from "The Rock."

Alcatraz was one of the most famous correctional facilities in the world. Cold, mysterious, and isolated, it housed some of the most notorious villains in U.S. history and

history columnist

touted a myth of invincibility.

Alcatraz is a 12-acre island, lying in the southwestern portion of San Francisco Bay, just one mile from the famed Fisherman's Wharf. Little or no vegetation can be found on the island because of the numerous interlocking boulder formations, from which its nickname, "The Rock," originates.

Its formal name is derived from the Spanish explorer Juan Manuel de Ayala, who referred to it as "Alcatrazes," after the unique birds his 1775 expedition discovered there.

The Rock's career as a government-run facility commenced during the early 1850s, when president Fillmore issued an executive order transforming the island into a military fortress.

This action was undertaken in response to the explosive growth of San Francisco resulting from the California Gold Rush. Fillmore wanted the city defended against potential foreign invasions.

As a result, U.S. Army engineers constructed an impressive citadel at the highest point on the island, and surrounded it with more than 100 cannons. By the late 1950s Alcatraz became the most fortified military site on the western coast of the United States, and stood poised to defend the entrance into San Francisco Bay against any intruder.

It was all for naught. There weren't any invasions, and by 1909, the island was home to no more than a few dozen military prisoners.

Then, in 1933, the U.S. Army transferred ownership of Alcatraz to the Justice Department for direct use by the Federal Bureau of Prisons. A gigantic cell house, capable of holding more than 500 inmates, was constructed where the citadel had been, and the first law-breakers were transferred there that autumn.

The federal government decided to build a maximum-security facility on the island of Alcatraz in a determined attempt to combat the soaring crime rate that was engulfing America during the late '20s and early '30s.

Extraordinary crime figures such as Al Capone, George "Machine Gun" Kelly, Alvin Karpis, and Arthur "Doc" Barker were all eventually transferred to The Rock.

Perhaps the most famous of all inmates was Robert Stroud, nicknamed the "Birdman of Alcatraz." Unfortunately, he has become somewhat of a folk hero, and a Hollywood film starring Bert Lancaster even depicted him as such. In reality, he was a deranged fanatic who struck women and had committed double homicide.

Alcatraz was designed to keep all of the rotten eggs in one basket. There were a precious few privileges. Prisoners were kept isolated in cells barely six feet wide. There were 17 counts each day, and periodic shakedowns. There were also 100 guards stationed on the island. This usually averaged out to one officer for every three convicts, the highest ratio in the history of the U.S. prison system.

Most of these guards actually lived on the island with their families in specially constructed apartments. There was a baseball diamond, two-lane bowling alley, dance floor and snack bar for the families and their children. These families quickly formed tightly-knit communities that provided support for one another. In addition, the warden and assistant wardens also resided on the island.

In its 20 years of operation as a Federal Prison, The Rock was witness to 14 escape attempts. The most violent of these took place on May 2-4, 1946, when six inmates jumped an unarmed guard, lifted his keys and gained access to several reserve weapons. They managed to temporarily gain control of the cell house, waging a ferocious gun battle with numerous correctional officers. The six men were eventually overwhelmed by a company of marines who were transported from the mainland.

The most famous escape attempt from Alcatraz culminated on the night of June 11, 1962, when Frank Morris and brothers John and Clarence Anglin dug out the rear of their cells, climbed up the utility corridor of the cell house, and using a raft made out of stolen raincoats, managed to reach the frigid waters of San Francisco Bay.

The dummy heads they had constructed to fool the nighttime guards were discovered in their beds early the next morning, at which time the greatest manhunt in United States history was immediately undertaken.

To this day, none of their bodies have been recovered. The question of whether or not they actually beat The Rock is still hotly contested.

Escalating operational costs led Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to officially close Alcatraz less than a year later.

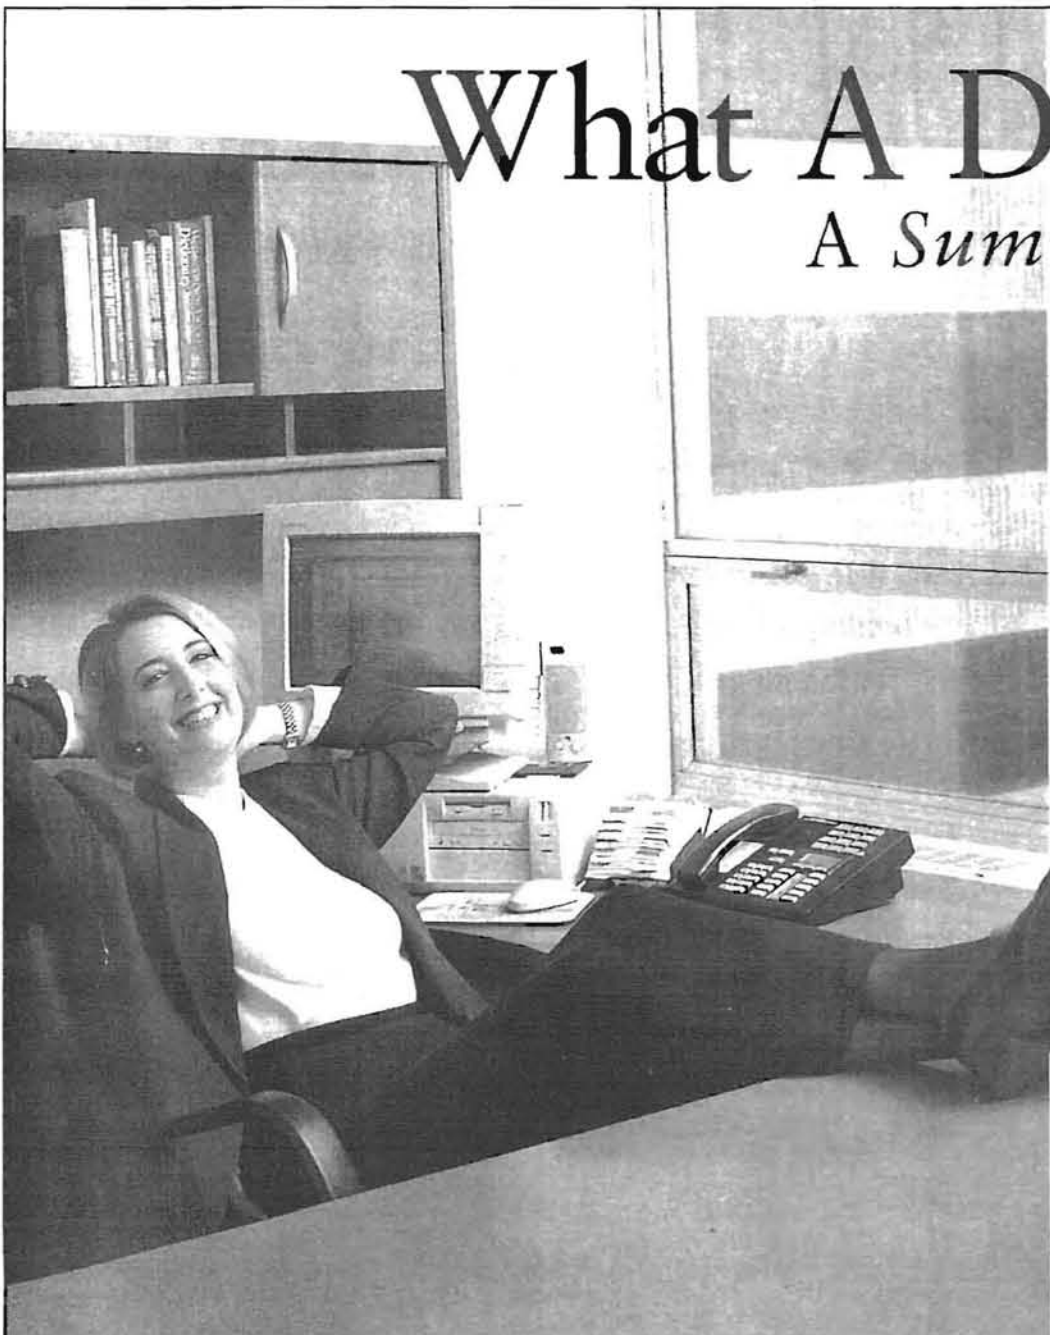

Today, Alcatraz Island is part of the National Park Service, attracting slightly over one million visitors each year.

Tennis team serves defeat to opponents

Rivermen take one win and loss over break, bringing overall record to 6-2

BY DAVE KINWORTHY
staff editor

The UMSL men's tennis squad hit a high point this season when they extended their winning streak to five matches with a 7-2 victory over Lindenwood University, improving their overall record to 5-1, 2-0 in the Great Lakes Valley Conference. The Rivermen swept all six of the singles matches with Matt Valkhard, Josh Heape, Eric Schruppf, Mario Gruden, Minh Phan, and Ryan Trela all claiming victories, while two of the three doubles teams were defeated by Lindenwood.

Four of the six singles matches went three sets, with all four favoring the Rivermen in the end at the No. 1, 2, 3, and 4 positions. Unfortunately for the Rivermen, their five-match winning streak came to an abrupt end over spring break as UMSL fell to a dominant conference foe in Southern Indiana

7-2. With the loss, the Rivermen fell to 2-1 in conference play. Phan at the No. 3 singles spot and Trela and Schruppf at the No. 3 doubles spot were the only victories for the Rivermen. The Rivermen then rebounded against Jefferson College, winning 7-2. The Rivermen won all three doubles matches with only the No. 1 doubles match, featuring Valkhard and Gruden, getting close at 8-6. The other two matches were decisively won 8-1 and 8-0. In singles, UMSL won four of six matches, only dropping the No. 1 and No. 3 spots as Valkhard and Schruppf were defeated by Jefferson College. The Rivermen move on to play at SIU-Edwardsville on April 4, before hosting Washington University on April 5. The Rivermen then hit the road for two conference games against Indiana-Purdue at Fort Wayne and heated foe Indianapolis on April 7 and 8.

much better showing in Florida, and in these first games, and I'm not going to make any excuses. We've squandered a lot of opportunities." As a team, the Rivermen are batting only .277, while opponents are at the .307 mark. "We have to swing a better bat," said Brady. "We've been inconsistent, and we need to eliminate that. We're only hitting at the .200 level with an aluminum bat. We've got to do a better job and put teams away when we can." With only four seniors on the squad, chemistry is something that will have to be learned. With a trip to Bellarmine two weekends ago, the Rivermen have officially kicked off Great Lakes Valley Conference play, and are beginning to take form. "This team is beginning to take shape," said Brady. "I've seen more positives than negatives on the field and I see the potential for us to improve."

achievements and improve, it will make everything go along better." For the six departing seniors, this season was bittersweet. For Ross and Coleman, this marked the end of a long stay. Ross has been a Riverman for four years, while Coleman has donned the red and gold for three, sitting through multiple losing seasons under former Head Coach Rich Meckfessel before ending their college careers not on a loss to Northern Kentucky, but on a winning season. Brian Markus, Luke Harms, Anthony Love and Michael Hamilton cap off the list of departing Rivermen. "Those guys really started this program heading in the right direction," said Bernsen. "We had Ross and Coleman before I came here and a couple other guys who have been here a couple of years and now it's time for the couple of juniors that are coming back and [the new recruits] to build on that." Bernsen does stress, however, that those six are not done at UMSL. "Now they've got to focus on the more important goal, and that is to graduate," Bernsen said. "Many of them are on track to graduate in the spring and I'm very proud of what they've accomplished both on and off of the court." Looking at next season, Bernsen is aware of the holes that he will need to fill. Heading into the 2001-

2002 campaign, only four letter-winners will return. "We're aware of the holes that those six guys will leave for next season," said Bernsen. "We want to establish a competitive practice setting where everybody is competing every day. That is the only way that a team can get better." With the addition of Craig Harbaugh as an assistant coach, recruitment should be very solid. "Coach Harbaugh has a great knowledge of the area and knows who to go for in the midwest. He has a great ability to recruit, and when you need six to seven quality guys, he can get them for us."
